

Dear INFJ,

Meet Tim.

Tim is an INFJ.

Tim has a flare for style and design. He also understands people and their needs quite well. He was self-employed as an interior designer for a year but felt with no support and longer hours, it would be best to make the switch to a small privately-owned company on a contract basis.

His current contract is with a bakery owner named Sergio who wants to blend the theme of 1940s gangster and crime film noir with donuts and croissants. This may seem like an odd combo, but Tim loves a challenge.

He immediately gets to work on several different and equally creative designs. Each design he shows to Sergio is rejected though, and it is a bit disheartening.

Lucky for Tim though, Tim is someone who can easily understand people and put themselves in their shoes, even if the shoes have spats. He slowly begins to understand Sergio's aesthetic and gradually gets closer to design plans Sergio can admire. The INTJ interior designer's ability to work on a one-on-one basis with the client while utilizing his own creative sense, enable Tim to maintain a healthy outlook, truly enjoy his job, and remain productive.

Warm regards,

PPCE
